Wants to Know How to Get Atter

at One Hundred and Forty-fifth street and Broadway.

The little girl had her hand in her father's as they started along the cross street toward Broadway. From all directions men and women were streaming toward a common stream streaming toward a common stream streaming toward a common stream str streaming toward a common centre-the klosk of the southbound subway Ro

The tall, handsome Postmaster and the little girl were passing the long line of billboards near the northwest corner. Directly opposite is Newbury's drug store. From a side window of this drug store a clerk saw a tall man was enti with reddish hair suddenly step up to Mr. Morgan and halt him. The clerk he said, "but I feel no alarm about my self. I do not believe that I am dandidn't notice from what direction the sandy-haired man had come, but it is gerou now known that he stepped up from behind.

The stranger had his hands rammed in his coat pockets.

"Are you Mr. Morgan, the Postmaster?" he asked, as the Postmaster

"I am." said Mr. Morgan.

The man's right hand came out of his coat pocket. The fist held a Colt's revolver, blued steel and wicked looking.

He poked the muzzle of his gun almost against the stomach of the Postmaster and fired. But in the almost infinitesimal period that elapsed between the drawing of the pistol and the shot Morgan had time to swerve his body half way about, and Dorothy slapped at the man's armed hand.

So the bullet did not go straight in. It entered the left side, well toward the front, passed through him and came out on the right side.

Clutching the wound, the Postmaster stumbled forward and grasped at the smooth face of the billboards for a moment. Turning about, he tried to reach his child, the desire to save her from harm evidently working strongly within his stunned consciousness. He stood upright for a moment, then he lurched forward, with all the strength gone out of his six feet of rugged brawn.

Probably three hundred persons were within earshot. Those who were also in sight faced the direction from which the sound came in time to see the rest of the tragedy.

They saw Morgan clasp his hands to his stomach, bend slowly forward with a puzzled, dazed look, slide forward on his face, and then twist over on his back. They saw the little girl in the blue sailor's suit stand helpless severed the larger intestines, but they did not attempt then to trace its course. Particles of clothing had been carried into the wound, and this caused fear at first of infection by the dyestuffs.

Meanwhile Lewis, the policeman, had got the West One Hundred and Fiftysecond street station on the telephone. and the reserves came. Reinforced by patrolinen, who gathered from half a dozen posts, these policemen took charge of the situation and cleared the streets. Up to this time nebody had touched the body of the dead assassin. In about twenty minutes Coroner's Physician Albert Westen, who lives around the corner, reached the place.

By that time a doubt regarding the McCue identification had been sarted. This doubt was based on the fact, which had just become known, that the wounded Postmaster said he did not know the man who shot him, and as he knew McCue, who is active in Republican politics on the upper west side of Harlem, very well, those who had been so certain in their earlier identification were now beginning to waver.
